PSYCHO-SOCIAL PROJECTS UNDER WAR CONDITIONS
"The first victims of war are often women and children. Even they do not lose life or limbs, they are often deeply traumatised in ways not visible to the naked eye. Victims of violence and rape cannot just walk back into everyday life as if nothing happened. As we all know, in the former Yugoslavia, peace has yet to break out for many of the victims. That is why psycho-social work deserves to be a high priority in our emergency aid programmes."

MARCH 1995
I would like to take this opportunity to stress the importance of the work carried out by Dr. Inger Agger from ECTF’s Psycho-Social Unit during the period February to December 1994. In carrying out this valuable work she was ably assisted by her Croatian team consisting of Dr. Sanja Vuk and Clinical Psychologist Jadranka Mimica.

This book represents ECHO’s involvement in something new in Emergency Humanitarian Relief Operations: assistance to the victims of war trauma by psychologists and social workers. For the first time in this kind of humanitarian assistance, the European Union, through ECHO, the biggest donor in this conflict, funds NGOs to work in this difficult field. This is to help alleviate the suffering and pain of the most vulnerable people in this war - women, children and the elderly - and to take care of them. This is achieved with the invaluable support of professionals throughout Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

As you can read in this book, the greatest number of NGOs work in Croatia. This is because in Croatia there are better conditions for engendering a feeling of security among people who have fled to a place of safety and refuge. It is important to note that a great number of refugees and displaced people from Bosnia-Herzegovina have been hosted in Croatia for this reason.

Traditional humanitarian relief operations help people satisfy their physical needs... nutrition, sanitation, hygiene, shelter, clothing etc. In providing psycho-social assistance under war conditions, ECHO helps with something intangible which is of utmost importance for every human being - the soul.

INTRODUCTION

This book is the second -map-\(^1\) of the territory of psycho-social assistance to victims of war in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia compiled by ECTF Psycho-Social Unit. It should be seen as an expanded and updated edition of -Theory and Practice of Psycho-Social Projects for Victims of War in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina- which was published in January 1994.

The book contains a theoretical section (Part One) with three introductory articles addressing issues concerning psycho-social assistance to victims of war. The feature article, -Under War Conditions, What Defines a Psycho-Social Project-, is an overview of emergency needs and interventions for victims of war, and it represents a collaborative effort of mental health professionals from three international agencies currently employed in Zagreb at UNHCR, WHO and ECHO/ECTF. The article is an attempt to conceptualize and convey experiences from more than one year of field work under war conditions.

The other section of the book (Part Two) contains a directory of the identified 185 psycho-social projects implemented by 117 organizations. In an annex, regional maps show the geographical distribution of projects and mental health services.

Information about the projects have been obtained by asking the organizations to complete a questionnaire. The information was collected from April to October 1994. Humanitarian aid workers are usually working under very stressful conditions with little time for such -paper work- as the filling out of questionnaires. This data collection, however, was met with a positive attitude. Most organizations find it valuable for their work to become visible. Moreover, they also find it essential to coordinate their activities with each other - an effort which should be facilitated by the directory.

The following phase in the production of the overview consisted in entering the information into a database. This process involved an interpretation of answers to the questionnaires. As mentioned above, this interpretation is our map of their reality and can certainly be augmented by other interpretations. Undoubtedly, some organizations have not been reached. Moreover, certain overlaps between projects have also been unavoidable.

We emphasize that the needs for assistance to the traumatized populations in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia are so enormous that even 185 psycho-social projects only cover the tip of the iceberg. An estimate shows that at about 700,000 people in the two countries have a severe trauma response condition and are in need of professional help. The consequences of lack of assistance will have a massive impact in the next generations, and can even ignite new wars. The data in this book should be used to point us to those in most urgent need of assistance.

European Community Humanitarian Office (ECHO) has increasingly responded to the need for psycho-social assistance to the victims of war. Presently (February 1995), ECHO is providing financial support to fifteen international psycho-social NGO's from six European Union member states. The NGOs are implementing eighteen projects either directly or through local NGOs.

ECHO's psycho-social emergency aid to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia is, through ECTF, coordinated with other international agencies - especially UNHCR and WHO. A primary role of ECTF Psycho-Social Unit is to give professional support to UNHCR and WHO in matters concerning psycho-social assistance and mental health.

This book should be viewed as a further contribution to this coordination and collaboration.

\(^1\) This is a quotation from the work of anthropologist Gregory Bateson which reminds us of the subjective nature of any theory and concept about the surrounding world: There are different ways of mapping this world depending on what we are looking for and what we are able to see. Our theories and methods define what we find and what will be on the -map- that is drawn.

I. UNDER WAR CONDITIONS: WHAT DEFINES A PSYCHO-SOCIAL PROJECT?

Emergency needs and interventions for victims of war

Inger Agger, Søren Buus Jensen and Marcia Jacobs 1

It must be recognized that the war in former Yugoslavia is having an impact on the physical and mental health of the entire population, especially that of refugees and displaced persons. Psychosocial assistance to refugees must be recognized as a priority and launched during the emergency phase. 2

INTRODUCTION

Mrs. D., age 46, recently arrived at a small refugee camp in a neighboring country to hers, with her son Amir, age 9, daughter Sanela, 13, and mother Indira who is 78. When enemy troops invaded her village, they took her husband and two older sons away at gunpoint. She has not seen or heard from them in seven weeks, and fears the worst. She and her husband were farmers, and owned a modern home, several outbuildings, a car and two tractors. Her mother has been totally blind for twenty years due to a degenerative eye condition. She needs some instruction and assistance to orient her to her new surroundings, a room in an old army barracks which the family shares with four other adults and two children. Amir has not attended school, as there is no room in the local school near the camp, and the special refugee school is five kilometers away, too far to walk. A month prior to being forced to flee their home, Sanela was diagnosed with leukemia, a potentially fatal disease with a good prognosis for cure with early detection and treatment.

In a war situation as experienced in the countries of former Yugoslavia, psychological trauma is widespread and accompanies physical, social and economic destruction of people and the environment. It is estimated that more than 700,000 people in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia (including UNPAs) suffer from severe psychic trauma and need urgent and qualified assistance. 3 In this emergency situation, the number of local professionals is only sufficient to cover less than 1% of the estimated needs for psycho-social assistance to the traumatized.

In response to this need, various types of psycho-social assistance are being offered to the war traumatized by international and local organizations. This effort is unprecedented in other war contexts. Although there seem to be quite a number of psycho-social projects for victims of war (185 projects implemented by 117 organizations in the ECTF investigation), this only covers a small percentage of the emergency needs.

In the refugee camp to which Mrs. D. arrived, an international organization supports the services of one social worker, Monday and Friday from 3 to 5 p.m. Mrs. D. has suffered the trauma of seeing her husband and sons abducted at gunpoint. She is living in fear about their situation. The social worker has neither the training nor the time to offer her therapeutic assistance. Moreover, the social worker is herself a refugee, and many of her resources are used in addressing her own trauma.

Mrs. D. has lost her home and it is very doubtful if she will ever be able to return to her country. In the camp, she is living under circumstances which in themselves are acutely stressful. Her mother and daughter need specialized health care which is not available from the local health system which is overburdened by the number of refugees and displaced in the country. Likewise, the local school system is not geared to receive all the refugee children, and with no structured activity her son is difficult to keep busy, especially by a mother who is anxious and depressed.

This case story is an illustration of the scope and diversity of problems faced by refugees and displaced, and hence the social workers and mental health professionals addressing their needs under war conditions. In the following these issues will be discussed in more detail.

THE GENERAL IMPACT OF WAR

Based on recent information about refugees, displaced and social cases (UNHCR, November 1994), an estimate has been made of how many people with severe trauma reactions we can expect to be in need of urgent and qualified professional help in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia (Jensen & Kosuta, in press). The estimate concludes:

About 700,000 people in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia have a severe trauma response condition and are in need of professional assistance.

The number of local professionals trained for trauma interventions are only sufficient to attend to less than 1% of those in need.

Another 700,000 people are estimated to suffer from trauma responses of a severity which, under peace conditions, would also qualify for professional help. About 78% of these two groups are located in Bosnia-Herzegovina, about 18% in Croatia and about 4% in the UNPAS.

Research on trauma responses shows that lack of attendance to these problems can impact at least the next two generations - even if the war stopped now. The symptoms to be expected are, for example, a massive increase in alcohol and drug addiction, suicides, all kinds of violence (criminal and domestic) and psychiatric illness. Moreover, unresolved traumatic experiences are likely to ignite new hatred and new wars.

The consequences of lack of assistance will also have a significant impact on the next generations.

A problem of this size needs to be addressed with interventions on all levels from trauma experts, general psychiatry, primary health care, psychosocial projects and public health initiatives with focus on treatment, and especially on prevention. As a consequence:

There is an emergency need for training of professionals on all levels.
What defines a psycho-social project under war conditions?

The field of psycho-social assistance seems to be in rapid expansion and the projects which have already been implemented cover a wide range of interventions and strategies. A prerequisite for an understanding and overview of the various types of assistance is to arrive at a general agreement about how to define psycho-social interventions. It is therefore useful to have a working definition of «a psycho-social project». The following definition is proposed:

The overall purpose of psycho-social emergency assistance is to promote mental health and human rights by strategies that enhance the existing psycho-social protective factors and decrease the psycho-social stressor factors at different levels of intervention.

A list of general psycho-social stressors as well as protective factors in the lives of refugees and displaced people will be specified. Knowledge about these basic stressors and protective factors is significant for an understanding of the mental health needs of war victims.

General psycho-social stressors

1) Economic hardship
2) Social disruption (separation from family, disappearance of family members, downward change in social role)
3) Physical/psychological violence
4) Ethnic persecution
5) Loss of home/country/family/friends
6) Danger/abuse during flight
7) Reception at arrival after flight
8) Settlement in collective centers or private accommodation
9) Uncertainty about future.

General psycho-social protective factors

1) Individual coping abilities
2) Family strength and unity
3) Social network
4) Ideological/political/religious consciousness.

Traumatization from different perspectives

Traumatization can be described from different perspectives. One perspective describes trauma in relation to distance (physical, psychological, social) of the stressor from the object. The object can be: a person, a family, a group, a country. Another perspective describes trauma in relation to frequency of stressors experienced by the object. A third perspective sees trauma in relation to the context in which stressors are experienced.
Distance to stressors:
- In primary traumatization the victim is the direct target of aggression (e.g.: the murdered, the tortured, the raped, the expelled). In our case example, Mrs. D. and her family in the camp have suffered the primary traumatization of expulsion from home and country.
- In secondary traumatization the stressor event is the primary traumatization of another person, family, group or country to which the secondary traumatized has a close relationship (e.g.: family or close friends of the murdered, tortured, raped, missing, expelled). Here, Mrs. D. suffered the secondary traumatization of the abduction of her husband and sons.
- In tertiary traumatization the stressor event is the primary or secondary traumatization of others. The victim is not closely related to the target object but gets in contact with the primary or secondary traumatized for other reasons (e.g.: witnesses to atrocities, neighbors to the expelled, members of persecuted ethnic groups, humanitarian aid-workers or therapists helping victims of war). The social worker in Mrs. D.'s camp is a caregiver suffering the tertiary traumatization of dealing with the suffering of individuals as in the D. family.

Frequency and context:
This classification, however, tells us little about the degree of traumatization (apart from direct physical elimination of the victim). Impact of stressors must be understood in relation to frequency and context of stressors in the environment, as well as to cultural and individual resources of victims (e.g.: coping abilities, family unity and strength, social network, ideological/religious commitment).

Under war conditions, frequency of stressor events is characterized by a repetitive impact of stressors that are experienced by victims in a context of threat where fundamental human rights are violated systematically and deliberately. Under these conditions, the entire population experiences continuous psychological, social and political harassment. This generates a basic fear which becomes a permanent component of everyday personal and social life.

In order to elect priority groups for psycho-social interventions under war conditions, levels of traumatization must be considered. When nearly everyone is exposed to powerful stressors, an understanding of levels of traumatization is required so that emergency aid can be offered to the most vulnerable who may also be the least visible!

IMPACT ON INDIVIDUALS AND SOCIETY
In order to plan psycho-social strategies of interventions, there must be a clear picture of the target groups for these interventions: who are they, how many are there, and where are they located? At present, we can define "who they are", and we also have a rough estimate of their quantity and geographic location.
Target groups to be given priority in psycho-social emergency assistance are those people who are most vulnerable to war traumatization. These groups can be listed as follows:
People exposed to direct war trauma

People who have developed psychological problems due to war violence ("direct war trauma"). This group includes all refugees and displaced people, among whom are groups that are especially vulnerable:

- Children and adolescents who are orphans or have been in concentration camps; children and adolescents whose families have disintegrated: (e.g.: fathers have been killed or have disappeared in the war or their parents have been divorced because they lived in "mixed marriages"); children and adolescents whose education has been disrupted after they became refugees and displaced.
- Women who have been tortured (e.g.: raped or abused in other ways), or whose families have disintegrated (e.g.: loss of husband, children, home); women living in "mixed marriages".
- Men who have been imprisoned in concentration camps, or who have witnessed or committed war atrocities; men living in "mixed marriages".
- Elderly who have been abused, raped and terrorized or who are without support from their family and/or from the social and medical welfare system.

People exposed to indirect war trauma

Another group which is especially vulnerable to war trauma is composed of those people who before the war had special needs for assistance from the social welfare system, the health system and the educational system ("indirect war trauma"). This group is composed as follows:

- Economically and socially marginalized populations from before the war (e.g.: jobless mothers living alone with their children; people with alcohol and drug problems; the chronic jobless).
- People with chronic somatic illnesses and physical handicaps (e.g.: children who need special educational support; people who need specialized medical assistance).
- Psychiatric patients and mentally retarded whose health status has deteriorated due to the break down of the health system, damage to hospitals, lack of medicine, food, general care, and the dissolution of family and social network.

The deterioration of the economy and the physical destruction of schools, hospitals and other governmental buildings has a general impact on the social, educational and health structures. These institutions are no longer able to take care of directly and indirectly war traumatized people. As a consequence of the war there is, thus, a general breakdown of the social welfare, health and educational system.

Care of these vulnerable groups is also affected by the direct and indirect traumatization of the staff who prior to the war worked in these institutions - teachers, social workers, therapists, doctors. They may experience direct, or in some cases indirect trauma. It may be that their institution is destroyed and they no longer have a place to work. Because of the deterioration of the economy, many receive no salary, or only the barest minimum. Some may have to work in offices which are protected from shelling by sandbags and frequently have to take their patients, or the children in their classes, to the bomb shelter. Many become traumatized themselves, and they have no experience or training in how to deal with this new situation to which they belong as much as their patients, clients or students. Nobody is outside of the situation. This is an unusual and specific condition of a society under war conditions.
CONSEQUENCES OF THE WAR

Reactions of individuals to direct trauma

The result of direct trauma is often described under the label Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). There is much debate on the part of mental health professionals on the use of this diagnosis in situations of war or organized violence. On the one hand, it is not reasonable to attach such diagnoses to whole populations, as they lose their value as working tools if applied indiscriminately. Moreover, refugees and displaced do not appreciate further stigmatization through such labeling. They are not insane, but are suffering from the war. The careless use of diagnoses can lead to individualization of a problem which is basically political. On the other hand, under-diagnosing by not recognizing the symptoms or their significance may lead to overlooking the suffering of large numbers of people. This failure may support the development of long range chronic reactions.

The most direct and appropriate method of deepening one’s understanding of PTSD, and trauma responses in general, is to talk with those who have experienced trauma. In this situation one should look for the existence of symptoms which intrude, unwanted, into one’s consciousness (e.g. flashbacks, nightmares, preoccupation with thoughts about a traumatic event). Other signs to watch for are a numbness of reaction, or, at the other end of the continuum, extreme reactions to trauma-symbolic stimuli (e.g. a car backfiring). The above reactions lead people to fear that they are ‘going crazy.’ A good practitioner can recognize both the symptoms and the fear, and reassure the victims that they are not losing their minds, but rather reacting in a normal and even adaptive way to extreme events.

Reactions of individuals to indirect war trauma

Under war conditions the people who needed special care before the war will now be on their own with minimal care. The physical and mental state of elderly, disabled people who live on the tenth floor in an apartment building without electricity and water will become seriously threatened. Mentally retarded and psychiatric patients in institutions that are bombed will wander about in the streets as targets for snipers.

The deterioration of the governmental system will have a wide range of consequences. On the public health level we can expect an increase in epidemic diseases (e.g. tuberculosis), of malnutrition related and stress related diseases. We can also expect a deterioration of health status of the chronically ill or handicapped people.

Moreover, there will be a massive increase in the number of patients suffering from war related wounds (sequelae from shootings, shelling, burns, etc.). These patients will need emergency treatment as well as long term rehabilitation and care.

In the local health care system adequate treatment of these patients is not always obtainable due to lack of medical supplies, lack of health care providers, destruction of hospitals. Patients cannot receive care outside of

5 Refugees and displaced are quoted as saying: “First we lose our home and family and have to live as foreigners here. Then they tell us that we are crazy.”
hospitals due to the deterioration of social services and family network. Patients often end up without care, for example in refugee camps or private accommodation.

Make-shift schools are set up in cellars where teachers creatively teach students by candle light without heating. Refugee children have to adjust to another school system, and adolescents are stopped at the beginning of their adult life with no access to secondary education. They become bored, alienated and despairing about prospects for their future.

The professional helpers, social workers, health staff, teachers face such huge problems in the traumatized population that they may become helpless and overwhelmed.

THE HUMANITARIAN MISSION

International responses to the war trauma

The war in the countries of the former Yugoslavia is the first war in Europe since the Second World War. That this could happen is a shock for everyone, and almost from the beginning of the war there has been a significant response by humanitarian aid organizations from United Nations (UN), European Union (EU) and various other international organizations. A pioneering aspects of this response has included psycho-social assistance to the war traumatized.

In the ECTF investigation presented in this book, we have attempted to gain an overview of the psycho-social emergency assistance in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia from UN agencies, the EU, international and local organizations.

Questionnaires have been sent out asking for information about the name of the organization, implementing partner(s), funding, title of project, area of fieldwork, activities, staff, beneficiaries and main goals of the project. The Directory of Psycho-Social Projects in this book presents a compilation of the answers we received. We do not claim that all organizations working in this field are covered, nor can self reporting of activities be relied upon as 100 percent correct. Thus, the results of the investigation must be viewed as a 'rough' map of the field, based on available information under war conditions. Even with the maximum functioning of all projects presently in place, we are only addressing the tip of the iceberg of human needs. Hence:

Data should be used to point us to places where there is too little rather than too much coverage.

We have made a statistical analysis of the geographic distribution of psycho-social projects in Bosnia-Herzegovina compared to the number of potential beneficiaries. We have followed the UNHCR categories of beneficiaries, which consider the entire population of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and in the UNPAs, to be directly war affected beneficiaries. In Croatia, only refugees and displaced are considered to be directly war affected beneficiaries.
The analysis shows the following distribution of psycho-social projects in the two countries:

It is not surprising that about ten times as many psycho-social projects are found in Croatia than in Bosnia-Herzegovina per 100,000 beneficiaries. Several reasons for this can be enumerated:

- It is more difficult to collect information in Bosnia-Herzegovina (e.g.: no telephones or faxes, war activities etc). This means that there probably are a number of projects in Bosnia-Herzegovina about which we have no information.
- In Bosnia-Herzegovina, the physical emergency needs (food, shelter, medicine etc) are so overwhelming that psycho-social assistance does not have a priority.
- In a context of threat to physical survival, psychotherapy on an intensive level is not possible nor recommendable.
- International staff encounter serious logistic and security problems working in Bosnia-Herzegovina.
- Similar arguments pertain to the UNPAs.

However, even if we include these reservations, there seems to be a need of expanding psycho-social assistance in Bosnia-Herzegovina and in the UNPAs. Although there is no absolute safety in a war zone, it would be inhumane to fail to respond to the emotional suffering of those living in such situations.
An analysis has also been made of the regional distribution of psycho-social project activities in Croatia compared to the number of refugees and displaced in the different regions. The analysis shows the following distribution of activities:

![Diagram showing the distribution of psycho-social project activities in Croatia across different regions.]

Figure 2. Psycho-social project activities in Croatia according to regions. One project can implement activities in several regions. Regional division according to maps in Annexes.

The analysis indicates that the Slavonia and Split regions should be given priority for new projects. However, as noted previously, we do not consider the activities in other regions sufficient as compared to the huge needs. The activities here must rather be seen as providing a 'basic' level which other regions should also, as a minimum, reach. This analysis should be interpreted as a guideline for directing emergency aid to the regions in most need.

An analysis has been made of the beneficiary groups which the various organizations report that they are targeting in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia. The analysis shows the following distribution of target groups:

![Diagram showing the percentage of project targeting various groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia.]

Figure 3. Target-groups of psycho-social projects in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia. The percentage of the total number of projects targeting the respective groups is presented.
The analysis shows a difference between the percentage of projects targeting women and men (75% of projects in both countries target women, while only 44% target men). This is understandable given the conditions of war where many of the men are mobilized, and refugee and displaced women far outnumber men. However, as men come back from the frontline and into the communities, their traumatic experiences will influence both their well being and the lives of their families. It is likely not too early to begin conceiving and preparing more projects which address men specifically. The analysis also indicates that more projects should be directed towards the whole family, including preschool children, youth and elderly.

In the following we will explore how two major UN agencies, UNHCR and WHO, conceptualize their contribution to community services, psycho-social and mental health assistance as part of "the humanitarian mission."

UNHCR Community Services and Psycho-Social Assistance

UNHCR, as the lead agency for humanitarian assistance in the republics of the former Yugoslavia, responds in a variety of ways to the psycho-social task of promoting mental health and human rights. Staff in all sectors (e.g. water, shelter) prioritize, in addition to technical assistance, refugee participation in decision making and follow through. In addition, Social Service staff works with Protection and Programme staff to identify vulnerable groups and individuals, and assess needs and resources for the delivery of humanitarian and legal assistance. In the former Yugoslavia, social service activities may be most visible in their support of psycho-social projects, as UNHCR is wholly or partially funding nearly 40 such projects in the five republics, and coordinating and providing logistical support for many others.

All refugees and displaced persons in the former Yugoslavia are beneficiaries of UNHCR, and we can assume all in this category have suffered direct trauma. Because of oppression or violence they have been forced to leave their homes, countries, material possessions, witnessed loved ones injured or killed, been tortured or raped themselves. UNHCR supported psycho-social projects primarily target such individuals with interventions in all levels of the pyramidal model (see below). These include such diverse programs as kindergartens, vocational classes for adolescents, women’s activity and self-help groups, and psychiatric counselling in collective centers.

UNHCR staff prioritize the on-going identification and assessment of vulnerable groups and extremely vulnerable individuals. For example, in Bosnia all persons in institutions (e.g. psychiatric patients, isolated elderly, the disabled) became the victims of indirect trauma. They were in vulnerable situations prior to the war, and the result of the war has been to increase that vulnerability dramatically. Psychiatric patients no longer have medications to control their symptoms. The elderly may have no access to water. The UNHCR actively supports NGO projects, with funds, logistics, etc., which target such vulnerable groups, with such programs as home visitors bringing social and medical care to the isolated elderly, and food distribution to institutional residents. Whenever possible com-
Community center projects for refugees and displaced are also made available to local residents. For example, English classes at a youth recreation center may be available to local youth as well. These local teens may be indirect trauma victims, suffering as a result of the financial strain to educational and social institutions in their country caused by the war conditions.

Local caretaking staff in the education, health, and psycho-social sectors (psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, teachers, doctors and nurses), are likely victims of direct or indirect war trauma themselves. Over and above this, they may be working in conditions which could not previously have been imagined. Their pre-war training most often did not prepare them for the enormity of numbers, or depth of suffering, experienced by those in need of their services. The UNHCR supports, in its psycho-social projects, NGOs who are training local staff to respond to these huge traumatized populations.

The UNHCR prioritizes the strengthening of local authorities and social institutions in responding to the needs of their own populations whenever possible. When, due to the nature of a war emergency, this is impossible, NGOs become implementing partners. This is always seen as a bridge, and projects are encouraged to be planned in ways which are sustainable and can in time be handed over to local institutions.

WHO interventions for psycho-social rehabilitation and mental health in the countries of Former Yugoslavia

Since April 1994 the activities of WHO in the field of psycho-social rehabilitation and mental health in the countries of Former Yugoslavia are organized by the Mental Health Unit within the "WHO Project for Rehabilitation of War Victims" based in the WHO, Zagreb Area Office.

The strategy of the Mental Health Unit is to work through and in accordance with governmental health authorities and the existing health care facilities. Activities are organized bearing in mind the responsibility of the local community, the local health care providers and the local health care system.

The main objectives of the Mental Health Unit are the following:

- to assist in developing comprehensive needs assessments and monitoring systems as the basis for the most appropriate intervention strategies under the present conditions;
- to assist in developing rehabilitation plans based on needs assessments, available resources and current WHO international standards of optimal care, treatment and prevention;
- to assist in coordination of rehabilitation activities of NGOs, intergovernmental organizations (IGOs) and the public health system;
- to assist in developing and setting up specific models of comprehensive interventions in accordance with the overall plans for rehabilitation;
- to assist in strengthening knowledge and skills among health care providers on all levels through comprehensive programmes of training, supervision and taking care of the caretakers;
- to assist in developing relevant methods of evaluation, quality assurance and monitoring of cost implications in rehabilitation work;
- to liaise with the media (public and scientific) and provide information on WHO's humanitarian activities within mental health care.
The activities of the Mental Health Unit are targeting the following four main issues. For each of them examples are mentioned. Details about the projects are presented in the «Directory of Psycho-Social Projects» in this book.

- Individuals and families, who have suffered direct war trauma. WHO is supporting a project for «Psycho-social rehabilitation of sexually violated men».
- Individuals and families who have suffered indirect war trauma. WHO is distributing mental health kits (psychopharmacological drugs) and providing expert evaluation of needs to mental health institutions.
- Health care providers who due to war conditions are at special risk for work related traumatization. WHO is providing training to local professionals such as seminars in the «Treatment of the Families of the Disappeared and Killed», and a programme for «Taking Care of the Care-Takers».
- Health care services which have been severely damaged either directly through physical destruction of institutions or indirectly due to lack of available resources. WHO is doing epidemiology/needs assessments of mental health care projects, and is establishing an «International Advisory Boards on Mental Health».

This «WHO Regional Model for Mental Health» addresses a population of 3-400.000 inhabitants and is the cornerstone in the activities of the Mental Health Unit. The activities are targeting all four issues mentioned above. The strategy is to implement a number of coordinated initiatives within the same region. In 1994 regional models have been set up in Sarajevo, Split and in Montenegro. For 1995, additional projects are planned in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

LEVELS OF PSYCHO-SOCIAL INTERVENTION

Having described intervention approaches by two UN agencies, we will now address this topic more generally. The concept «levels of intervention» is an attempt to describe the methods employed in order to achieve psychological and social change in a given target population. Interventions can be carried out on different levels, as illustrated below:

A man has had his leg amputated after being shot by a sniper.

- On the biological level, he needs emergency surgery, antibiotics, and later a preliminary prosthesis. He also needs some training in the use of the prosthesis. An immediate biological intervention is appropriate and important.
- On the social level, he can lose his job as a consequence of the handicap, resulting in economic hardship and a downward move in social status. Maybe his wife will not accept a handicapped man, and his marriage and family life will be threatened. Thus, interventions with focus on his social well-being would likewise be appropriate and important.
- On the psychological level, he is probably severely traumatized from the experience of being shot. Moreover, he is probably also traumatized by the reality of his new life conditions as a handicapped man without a leg and with a prosthesis. Therefore, psychologically oriented interventions with focus on this situation are also appropriate and important.
- Finally, we must consider the time perspective as his needs differ in the emergency situation and in the long run. Therefore, it is important to plan emergency interventions so that they are also first steps of a long-term process.

The previous case-example illustrates how interventions on different levels often are required to meet the needs of war victims.
The ECTF investigation

In order to ascertain the varieties of projects and levels of intervention in the field, the ECTF Psycho-Social Unit conducted an investigation in which data were collected from April to October 1994. Organizations were asked to indicate the activities they offered in the following areas: community development/social services; education; psychologically oriented group work; psychological services; psychiatric services and training. The following analysis was extrapolated from the data received:

![Bar chart showing levels of intervention in 185 psycho-social projects in BiH and Croatia.]

It appears that more than half of all projects report that they are offering community development/social services (68%). What is more striking is that more than half are offering psychological services (63%), and more than half are offering psychologically oriented group work (mostly self help groups) (54%).

33% of the projects also offered psychiatric services, and 63% had training programmes for their staff as part of the projects.

These activities, thus, addresses themselves to all levels of intervention.

The pyramidal model for psycho-social interventions

In this model, psycho-social interventions are differentiated from two other major levels of intervention:

- Political interventions, e.g.: efforts to stop the war, peace-making, peace-keeping, human rights appeals and other political and military interventions.
- Physical survival interventions, e.g.: food, water, shelter, fuel, medical care.

Psycho-social levels of intervention follow these basic levels of intervention. We have arbitrarily divided psycho-social interventions into five levels.

The purpose of this stratification is to create a model which enables us to define the most appropriate intervention strategies for a certain target group with specific needs, given available resources (economically and professionally).
An example:
Intensive psycho-therapy with daily sessions offered by a highly educated professional may be the ideal assistance to a severely traumatized individual. However, the presence of thousands of people in need of such treatment calls for more appropriate interventions on other levels. These interventions can, nevertheless, be based on optimal professional knowledge and practice. Consequently, it is meaningless to rank the different levels of interventions according to «quality». Furthermore, it must be recognized that a psycho-social project can encompass different levels of intervention, and consequently the possibility of acting on more than one level.

The pyramidal model contains the following five levels of psycho-social intervention:

- Emotional and social survival interventions
  Examples: Concrete services as practical help with child care, tracing of missing family members, translation by interpreter, scholarships. This level encompasses community development/social services activities.

- Task-oriented group interventions
  Examples: Educational activities, knitting groups for women, income-generating activities, training of staff, recreational activities.

- Psychologically oriented group interventions
  Examples: Self-help groups, trauma-survivor groups, testimony groups.

- Counselling interventions
  Examples: Individual, family or group-emotional and social survival interventions

- Counselling interventions
  Examples: Individual, family or group counselling (with focus on the present and the problems which the client is already aware of). This level encompasses psychological and psychiatric services in the ECTF investigation.

- Intensive psycho-therapy interventions
  Examples: Individual, family or group therapy (with focus on underlying psychological dynamics). This level is also encompassed by psychological and psychiatric services in the ECTF investigation.

Strategies for enhancing protective factors and diminishing stressor factors can be combined with each level of psycho-social intervention.

Professional resources needed vary according to levels of intervention. Intensive psychotherapy interventions require trained psychotherapists, while counselling interventions require trained counsellors. Interventions on the levels of psychologically oriented group activities, task oriented activities and emotional/social survival activities can be implemented by staff without specific mental health training.

On all levels it is important to involve local professionals and aid workers as much as possible. Interventions from international organizations should mainly offer funding and support for the reestablishment of local mental health structures as well as training and supervision of staff.

In the following we will use an example of how training may serve as a trauma intervention. This example shows how training programmes can reach several levels of interventions simultaneously, serving as both a means of professional training, as well as psychotherapy for the traumatized trainee.
Training as a Trauma Intervention

- Serifa, a 28 year old, has been a refugee for 3 months. Being in a mixed marriage, her family stayed in their home as long as they could, feeling they would avoid separating if at all possible. Finally her husband felt that things were getting too dangerous for his wife and 3 year old son, and plans were made for them to leave without him. The day before the scheduled departure, her son was killed by a grenade which hit the balcony of their flat. The next day, in shock, she left. She was a social worker before the war, and when she arrived in the country of refuge, she sought volunteer work in a women's organization of refugees helping other refugees. She states to the group, after telling her story in the first day of a training session, that the only thing keeping her from losing her mind is the thought that, «maybe I can help someone who has suffered even more than I have».

- Alida is a 27 year old psychology student. Three years ago, at the beginning of the war, her fiance was killed on the front lines. She quit school and has spent all of her time, since that incident, organizing services for injured combat veterans and their families.

- In the second day of a 5 day training for staff of counselling centers for traumatized war victims, one member of the group, a psychiatric resident, arrives 2 hours late, visibly shaken. Just as he was about to leave to come to the session, his street was shelled by the enemy. His neighbors, an elderly couple, were seriously injured, and he administered first aid until they arrived at the hospital. The hospital was filled with casualties, and he doesn't know if his neighbors will survive.

In the former Yugoslavia many mental health professionals have lived, or are still living, in war conditions. They are all the targets of direct, and often also indirect trauma. These traumatized individuals are a huge resource in their country, needed to do the primary emergency work for their fellow citizens who have been emotionally devastated by war. Experientially based training programs, which give them the space to work directly with their fear, anger, grief and mourning, and use this work to form the basis for intervening with those suffering similarly, can be extremely valuable. In the training, the participants are given the support and nurturing needed to integrate their own traumatic experiences, and to move toward helping others. At the same time they are gaining practical know-how, as well as theoretical knowledge in such areas as trauma psychology, which their pre-war training probably did not provide.

Experiential training as an intervention has many advantages. Personnel who have an experiential model for intervention, as opposed to theory only, will know what works and what doesn't. This will increase their confidence in working with others. This confidence will be greatly needed to face the severe situations they will meet. Also, each person trained to function as a mental health service provider will touch the lives of many more people, so the time and money spent on training is extremely cost effective. Finally, training local personnel strengthens local structures and institutions, and the ability to «take care of one's own» is not only necessary, but also fosters integrity for the society as a whole.
SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

From a psycho-social perspective, under war conditions the number and severity of stressor events increase significantly. This leads to traumatization in the general population, and more particularly in vulnerable groups, such as elderly, women, children, and those who had special needs for assistance from the social, health and educational institutions before the war. Some might suffer from direct war events, and others from the indirect effect of the deterioration of societal institutions. In the first case we might expect more traumatic stress reactions, in the second a more general deterioration of health or social conditions.

The magnitude of the problem is such that we can estimate that 700,000 people in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia have a severe trauma response condition and are in need of professional assistance. At the same time, the number of local professionals trained for trauma interventions are only sufficient to attend to less than 1% of those in need. We should be aware that the consequences of lack of assistance to these populations will also have a massive impact on the next generations.

Humanitarian bodies, such as UN agencies (e.g. UNHCR, WHO), European Community Humanitarian Office (ECHO), local and international NGOs, and local structures and institutions have responded to this discouraging imbalance between needs and resources in a number of ways.

Projects have been developed which provide psycho-social emergency assistance for the promotion of mental health and human rights. The needs of the beneficiaries are so varied as to require projects which address a number of levels of intervention, from social to educational to psychotherapeutic.

A «Directory of Psycho-Social Projects» describing 185 projects from 117 organizations, has been compiled by the ECTF. In an analysis of data from this investigation, it has been concluded that although a large number of projects are in operation, we are far from responding adequately to the quantity of needs. In fact, data should be used to point us to places where there is too little coverage, and it would be a mistake to think there are places where there is too much.

In addition to developing direct services for war victims, humanitarian organizations are addressing the lack of resources by initiating and supporting training programs to strengthen the ability of local professionals and institutions to respond to the enormous number of traumatized persons.

It must be emphasized that psycho-social assistance does not solve fundamental problems arising from war and organized political violence. Psycho-social interventions and mental health assistance can reduce the suffering of victims and strengthen their means for self protection and healing. Interventions at the social and psychological levels can also play an important role in peace-making and reconciliation after the war has stopped. However, a basic precondition for the success of this assistance is interventions on political levels towards ending the war.
II. A LONGING FOR SARAJEVO

Understanding the Trauma of Humanitarian Aid Workers

Inger Agger

The title of these reflections is inspired by a debriefing session I had with a young ex-patriate humanitarian aid worker. He had worked for several months in the war-zone in Bosnia and had just returned from a long mission in Sarajevo. On his return to headquarters, located at a distance from the war-zone, he suddenly asked to be released from his contract. He was obviously an idealistic person who had been shocked by the destruction and horrors he had witnessed in the war-zone. However, he had also met an atmosphere of great human compassion and warmth in Sarajevo.

People in this encircled city were united and dedicated to the struggle for common survival, he said. He told me about this besieged group who had welcomed him with much warmth, in contrast to the reception he had received in other places where humanitarian aid workers were often looked on with scorn. There was something special about Sarajevo, he told me.

One of the reasons he gave for quitting was, that he did not want to become «one of those who always had to return to Sarajevo». He did not want to fall under the spell of the city. He wanted to go back to his home country, get married and live a normal life. Maybe he wanted to create «his own Sarajevo». His faith in human mankind had been shaken in some ways, but he had also felt an intense closeness and sharing of experiences with the victims of war.

To me, his «longing for Sarajevo» expressed something deeply human: a longing for unity, closeness and warmth; a longing for a safe space in which men, women and children protected each other against evil and death. The paradox, and his dilemma was that this safe haven was created here at the expense of enormous human suffering. The cost of returning to Sarajevo was mortal danger. However, in confrontation with the terror of war, this young aid worker had also met layers in himself - until then hidden - but now brought forth to awareness: a longing for peace and harmony - all that which in «normal» life is taken for granted and, therefore, not fully appreciated.

The story of this young humanitarian aid worker is not unique. In fact, it was one of my first «astonishments» when I arrived in the former Yugoslavia. Why were so many people who worked for international aid-organizations willing to risk their lives to go into the war-zone? Some of the aid workers were distributing vital supplies for mere, biological survival of the victims of war. Others were working in psycho-social projects for the victims. This distinction did not seem important. When asked about the threat to their own lives both groups tended to answer that they did not 7 This article is an elaboration of a lecture given at the seminar Psychotherapeutic Interventions With Victims of Organized Violence, 9-14 August 1993, Refugee Studies Programme, University of Oxford in collaboration with Psycho-social Center for Refugees, University of Oslo. The terms transference and countertransference traditionally refer to the reciprocal impact that the patient and the therapist have on each other during the course of psychotherapy (Wilson & Lindy, 1994). Thus, countertransference can be defined as all those reactions of the analyst to the patient that may help or hinder treatment (Slavik, 1987, p. 3, quoted in Wilson & Lindy, 1994).

This initial, and to me quite surprising, experience, gave way to some questions: Does this denial of danger allow us to understand certain dynamics in the world of humanitarian aid workers? Naturally, the war and the close contact with its victims will also impact on the aid workers, but how?

The trauma

In the field of post-traumatic stress research and practice, it is widely recognized that the trauma of victims also has an impact on therapists and other helpers. The helpers need help, as well. Different concepts have been used to describe the situation of the helpers: «vicarious traumatization» (McCann & Pearlmann, 1990), «traumatic countertransference» (Herman, 1992), «secondary victimization» (Erinen & Liebkind, 1993), «tertiary traumatization» (Agger & Jensen, in press) or «wounded healers» (Comas-Diaz & Padilla, 1990; Agger & Jensen, 1994). Moreover, this type of traumatization can lead to powerful countertransference reactions which must be duly recognized in order to avoid burn-out and other negative effects (Wilson & Lindy, 1994).

As observed by Judith Herman (1992, p. 140), trauma is contagious. Therapists listening to trauma stories, and humanitarian aid workers in a war-zone or a disaster become witnesses to atrocities, and easily become emotionally overwhelmed. They identify with the victims, and experience some of the same emotions of rage, powerlessness, despair and terror.

Moreover, the context in which emergency humanitarian aid-workers operate has another aspect: They are «on the spot» witnesses to the traumatic events or their immediate sequels, and they cannot leave their office and go home «to normality» when the work-day is over.

As noted by Erinen & Liebkind (1993, p. 961): «In a disaster, the demand-capability ratio is out of balance and in many cases the demands exceed resources». Moreover, «disaster workers often set high expectations for themselves at this task; consequently, failure or inability in helping to reduce the trauma of the situation may lead to feelings of personal failure» (ibid., p. 961).

However, there is also another aspect of relief work. «One of the inspiring sides of disaster work is the satisfaction that saving human life brings. The atmosphere is typically intense, and sharing experiences creates a feeling of closeness and common purpose...the relationship between workers and victims is often much closer emotionally than in normal working life» (ibid., p. 961). This type of work is very gratifying and adventurous for aid workers in comparison with the jobs they could obtain under more ordinary circumstances.
The scope of this article does not allow for a discussion of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). For a comprehensive overview of this field, see, for example, Wilson (1989) or Herman (1992).

Frequently, aid workers are «idealistic humanitarians, hoping to make a difference... (but) the experience can yield more disillusionment than reward» (Stearns, 1992). In fact, as Sarah Stearns points out in her paper, they can sometimes do more harm than good. She cites de Waal (1988, p. 204) for the concept «willful harmdoing» which is exemplified by a situation where the aid worker is eating lunch while malnourished children are looking on.

Thus, it is common that aid workers experience feelings of guilt when they have all that which the victims do not have - including, money. Also, they can have strong experiences of «survivor guilt» when they have been confronted with the suffering of victims and felt a (forbidden) relief that this did not happen to themselves or their families.

These reactions of aid-workers fit well into the concept of countertransference. In the following, I will briefly outline some general countertransference reactions experienced by therapists and other helpers who work with victims of violence. These victims have undergone severely stressful experiences - they have suffered - and are maybe still suffering from «traumatic stress».

Countertransference

When working with victims of violence, helpers often experience an array of countertransference reaction which can be divided into two main categories: 1) avoidance-reactions characterized by distancing, denial, detachment and withdrawal, and 2) intrusive-reactions characterized by over-identification, guilt reactions, and over-idealization and enmeshment with victims (Wilson & Lindy, 1994). The helper can experience both main types of reactions at different stages. Probably, idealistic humanitarian aid workers will be most likely to experience intrusive reactions at the beginning of their field experience and maybe later move towards avoidance reactions as a way of protecting themselves against the overwhelming feelings of guilt and despair. The young man I mentioned in the beginning could be seen as an example of this process.

Intrusive countertransference reactions can be experienced by aid-workers as devastating moral conflicts. As a representative from one organization told me:

> Our people in the war-zone find themselves in severe moral dilemmas. Often victims beg them for help to leave the area, but the organization cannot provide this help because that would be to aid ethnic cleansing which is against its mandate. This is a very stressful situation for the aid-workers, even though they are prepared to work in a war-zone. After a while they get «a bit tired». The pressure is constant. Not one week passes without something terrible happening. There is never a moment of rest.

Aid workers feel personally responsible for the policy of their organization and get «a bit tired» when they cannot solve the problem on the individual level.
A representative from another organization told me about the dilemma of having witnessed horrible crimes and not being able to do anything:

There is a great problem about the connection between theory and practice. What we stand for and what we do is very different. The situation is extremely difficult. Even the most basic things are impossible to do. The task of the organization is very hard. One person has to do 10 person's job, and they have to carry on, until they break down. It has been very traumatic to watch all this going on. It has been necessary to sacrifice your own convictions - a real moral conflict.

These feelings of guilt, despair and powerlessness can maybe give us one clue to a longing for Sarajevo. If the aid worker ventures into dangerous areas in the war-zone she is at least doing something for the victims. By risking her own life she might alleviate moral conflict and guilt. It can also be seen as an attempt to give meaning to a meaningless world of mutual human destruction. An extreme solution to despair can be found in the role of aid workers as immortal heroes who defy all warnings and go off into the war-zone on their own. Another variation is the role of aid workers as gods or goddesses who imagine that their project is the most important of all. In psycho-analytical language both of these reactions can be seen as grandiose solutions to powerlessness. These narcissistic reactions can manifest themselves as an oscillation between the two poles: feelings of being an especially gifted aid worker at certain times, and feelings of utter despair at other times.

In the midst of these emotional storms, aid workers are supposed to implement psycho-social projects of assistance for the real victims of war - the millions of refugees and displaced people who cannot quit the job and go home.

Therefore, if she chooses to stay, the aid worker must find a way to cope with the unbearable inner conflicts, the confusion, the guilt, the grandiosity and powerlessness. In other words, she must find a way of dealing with her own countertransference reactions in order to go on with the task of providing assistance to the refugees. She needs an answer to the question which all victims of trauma ask, namely: Why did this happen to me? Why am I feeling and reacting like this?

One way to answer this question is for her to understand the dynamics of countertransference. However, this understanding is not only an intellectual process. Often, countertransference reactions are not recognized as such by aid workers and other helpers. Therefore, supervision groups should be a natural part of her working environment. In such groups, she would be able to de-privatize her own reactions when she recognizes similar processes among her peers. Moreover, during supervision she could also become aware of the un-conscious dynamics of her reactions to disaster and tragedy.

Unfortunately, it is often impossible to establish regular supervision during an emergency aid operation. Also, many aid organizations do not recognize the need for supervision. In this situation, aid workers should create their own peer-groups: self-help groups in which they together with other helpers can ventilate and share their experiences and feelings. The establishment of ongoing self-help groups is often one of the important goals of psycho-social projects for victims. However, such groups are also important for the helpers.
In acute cases - for example, after the killing of a fellow aid worker de-briefing groups should be established as soon as possible for the rest of the staff. This need for de-briefing is now being recognized by many organizations. As of yet, regular supervision is still rather seldom, but, hopefully, a change of policy in the aid organizations is underway in this respect.

Countertransference is, however, not the only important aspect of the aid-worker's experience. If we focus exclusively on inner-psychological dynamics we loose an important social dimension which must also be understood in order to analyze the trauma of humanitarian aid workers. In addition, we must look at some of the organizational factors influencing working conditions of helpers. Some of these factors have already been hinted at in the quotes I gave from interviews with aid workers. For example: "What we stand for and what we do is very different; "One person has to do 10 person's job, and they have to carry on, until they break down; "there is never a moment of rest."

Institutional factors

In general, "institutions may be supportive or oppositional to the efforts made by mental health care providers; flexible or rigid to innovation, change and improvement of services; self-contained or collaborative in efforts at networking with allied agencies for the benefit of the client with PTSD; nurturing or indifferent in providing adequate mechanisms of support for the service providers themselves" (Wilson & Lindy, 1994).

How are most humanitarian organizations characterized along these dimensions? How do they support the professional efforts of aid workers? How do they respond to aid workers' proposals of innovation? How do they support aid workers' collaboration with aid workers from other organizations? How do they meet aid workers' needs for emotional support? In the following I will briefly look at these questions. The relationship between the aid worker and her organization is a determinant factor for how she can cope with countertransference reactions. These questions, therefore, need to be examined and discussed thoroughly. Here, however, I will just touch upon a few important points.

How do humanitarian organizations support the professional efforts of aid workers?

In general, top levels of international humanitarian organizations want to profile their particular organization. This is an important way of gaining political influence and funding.

The humanitarian aid worker in the field represents the organization. As mentioned before, the aid worker is often a committed, maybe idealistic, professional who wants to help the victims. This professional must, however, also deliver another product to the organization: visibility. Often quantity seems to be more important for visibility than quality. The number of beneficiaries reached is a factor which is easier to measure than changes in social or psychological dynamics.
In the field, the aid worker must be both engaged and professional in her relationship to the victims. This engagement and professionalism requires time and energy. Often, these requirements are not compatible with the demands for quantity and visibility of the organization.

After some time, the aid worker may find herself in an unbearable conflict between the demands of her organization and her professionalism. She usually works on a short-term contract, and if she protests too vehemently, her organization will maybe find a new committed field worker - and the process starts all over again.

How do humanitarian organizations respond to aid workers' proposals of innovation?

It is not easy to change huge international aid organizations. Politics and economic interests are developed far away, at the top-level. Individual aid worker in the field have little information about the on-going processes at headquarters. Mostly, aid workers will have to adopt an attitude to their jobs of «take it or leave it». It will, therefore, be rather difficult for the individual aid worker to influence the organization towards innovation, change and improvement of services.

How do humanitarian organizations support aid workers' collaboration with other organizations?

As many aid organizations compete with each other for funding and influence they will also have a tendency of being self-contained instead of collaborative. The aid worker who becomes an employee of one organization might experience distrust or anger from aid workers employed by other organizations if she «moves into their territory». In the beginning, when the aid worker has not identified closely with her organization this experience can be very confusing. This type of competition between organizations can limit aid workers' possibility for peer-group support from colleagues in the field.

How do humanitarian organizations meet aid workers needs for emotional support?

Needs for emotional support can best be met through regular supervision of aid workers. However, as pointed out earlier, these needs are rarely met during emergency operations. Some organizations do recognize needs for de-briefing of field staff after major security incidents, and needs for supervision are also beginning to be acknowledged by some organizations. As many aid workers are operating in rather isolated conditions in the field, it is not easy for them to form peer-support groups or self-help groups. A safe haven is, therefore, not easily found anywhere.

Conclusion

By reflecting on «a longing for Sarajevo», I have attempted to understand some of the stressors of emergency humanitarian aid work. Regrettably, aid workers seldom have time to reflect on their experiences during field work. The dual vision of both research and practice is, in fact, a useful transformative attitude to bring with you into the field.
The trauma of humanitarian aid workers and their countertransference reactions should be recognized, because they are important determinant factors for the quality of the emergency assistance to victims. Likewise, the humanitarian organizations should have prominent roles as flexible and collaborative supporters of the aid workers. Hopefully, this perspective will gain further acceptance at both the individual and organizational levels.

Aid workers' longing for Sarajevo - longing for closeness and warmth, longing for a safe haven - can thus be interpreted as a deeply human search for a "holding" environment, for nurturing and support - in the midst of isolation, power struggles and destruction. In reality, both victims and helpers have common interests: a recognition of fundamental human rights and a safe space which allows for excursions into the disturbing and distressing aspects of human life.

Literature

In the following, I am going to touch on some issues connected with therapy for women victims of war. Especially, I want to discuss the issues of human rights, ritual space, testimony, gender and social memory. I base these reflections both upon a book I have recently published, «The Blue Room. Trauma and Testimony among Refugee Women: a psycho-social exploration», and upon experiences from working in a context of war violence for more than one year.

The book grew out of a research-project conducted in Denmark some years ago on sexual violence against refugee women. However, my present experience here in the countries of the former Yugoslavia, as Coordinator of psycho-social projects for war-traumatized women and children, has confirmed the use of sexuality as a repressive tool against women to a saddening degree. The rapes of women here are also one of the weapons of war - both directed at the women themselves, but also at their families and their people (Stiglmayer, 1994).

First I will shortly introduce the ritual space, I attempted to create during interviews with 40 traumatized refugee women. Next, I will describe some therapeutic uses of testimony within «ritual space» - a space which was created during the interview-process. Thereafter, I will comment on gender specific abuse of women within the topic of human rights violations of women. Lastly, I will focus on issues connected with social memory to especially address the apparent contradiction between testimony and peace-building.

HUMAN RIGHTS

I use the concept of human rights as my point of departure. By employing this concept which is based on the United Nations World Declaration about universal human rights, I take an ethical non-neutral stand. This perspective focuses on universal cross-cultural rights, and in the case of refugee women, it directs attention towards universal aspects instead of different cultural contexts. Moreover, the ethical dimension of this concept of universal human rights also has implications for therapy: it places the blame outside of the victim, and also forces the therapist to take a moral stand. I find that the concept of human rights can be an eye-opener for both patient and therapist. For many refugees it will be a surprise that they have any rights at all. It will be a surprise that the international community has agreed on their right to a dignified life. This may be a first step in a consciousness-raising process, or a process of trauma therapy. An awareness of the ethical dimensions of the human rights concept may also be the beginning of a consciousness-raising process for the therapist (Herman, 1992).

There is a growing awareness in the field of trauma therapy of the need to discuss how we - as therapists and researchers - react to the confrontation with horrifying trauma-stories about deliberate, man-made human rights violations. How do we - who are supposed to be the victims' helpers and containers, manage our own pain?

At the same time, human rights violations are a world-wide problem. Of special concern are the wide-spread violations of women's rights. Instead of diminishing, it is a growing problem which is encountered both in the industrialized societies of the West, and in the developing countries. As therapists who work with victims of trauma, we will therefore meet women and girls who have experienced gender specific human rights violations - be it refugee women who have been sexually abused in camps, in their homes or during flight, or victims of domestic violence. We -as therapists and researchers - are, therefore, confronted with the problem of how to create a space which becomes healing for both the victims and for ourselves. A space which will allow the victim to become a survivor, and allows the therapist or researcher to reframe her own pain.

RITUAL SPACE

After I had worked for five years as a therapist for torture-victims, I decided that I needed to process some of the experiences I had had through returning to theory and research. The research project I planned was directly connected with my previous work. It was governed by an attempt to understand some of the strange and terrifying experiences some of my female patients had told me about: more specifically, the use of sexuality in political prisons as part of torture. It was an attempt to both give meaning to the unbelievable stories I had heard - that is, to reframe them - and to give my own testimony of how it is to meet with deliberate human evil. I wanted to add my testimony to the social memory about female oppression.

The research-project involved interviews with 40 refugee women. I was again unavoidably placed back again into the therapist's problem of containing the trauma story as the women told me their life-story. I was now in the position of a researcher, however this did not make the task easier. For one thing, I could not forget my clinical background - so I was there - in the room - The Blue Room, as I called it - both as a therapist and as a researcher. Secondly, my clinical background was very valuable for the interview-process because it gave me courage to go into parts of the trauma-story which were important to document - from a theoretical and human rights point of view.

So what did I do? I tried to create a ritual space, which I called -The Blue Room-. The walls of the room in which I carried out the interviews were painted blue. But I also use -The Blue Room- as a metaphor for the space in which the interviews took place. In this space I met the women who came from 10 different countries, and in this space they told their trauma-story. In this room the woman and I together created a space which I have called -the third culture-. We came from different cultures, but in The Blue Room we created something new and different - a third culture - to which we both contributed. It was in this context of something third that the story was told by her and heard by me.
At the beginning of our meeting in The Blue Room I explained the purpose of my research project - namely to gain more knowledge of the special conditions of refugee women, and to publish this information, so that people in asylum countries would know more about the human rights violations which take place against women. I also spoke about my own background: that I had worked for several years as a therapist with torture victims, and that I was not «neutral» as a researcher. I shared my belief that it was important that what happens to women becomes part of social memory. I tried to establish an atmosphere of compassion and solidarity.

An important remedy for creating the ritual space of The Blue Room was also the tape-recorder. I started my interview by testing the tape-recorder. For this test, I had the woman tell her name, her age and her country. I stopped the tape-recorder and played the tape back. Together we listened to and confirmed that the woman’s voice was recorded, and that it could be heard in The Blue Room. From then on we started recording the interview. She then knew, that her voice and her name could be heard. We were ready to start her testimony - her contribution to social memory.

TESTIMONY

In the meeting with the refugee women in The Blue Room, I, used testimony as a research method. Through this method, I attempted to unite my experience from the use of testimony in the consciousness-raising groups of the women’s movement with experiences from my therapeutic training and my work with testimony as a trans-cultural therapeutic method. This method implies that the research process and therapeutic process are not separable. For victims of human rights violations, testimony has a special significance, because it becomes a documented accusation and a piece of evidence against the perpetrators. ‘Testimony’ as a concept has a special, double connotation: it contains objective, judicial, public and political aspects, and subjective, spiritual, cathartic and private aspects. Testimony thus contains the quality of uniting within its structure the private and the political levels. In this way testimony is both «psycho» and «social» - and, therefore, is also a «social remembrance» - a process of creating social memory.

During the interview-process, not one woman refused to give testimony. On the contrary, each seemed to find it important to give this «confession» against their oppressors.

All the women had suffered human rights violations. Some had been in prison and had been tortured, others had close relatives who had been tortured or murdered, still others had been forced to leave small children with their family in their homelands in order to save their own lives. Some had lived clandestinely for long periods in their own countries before they could get out. After arrival in Denmark, many had lived for months in refugee camps, anxiously waiting for asylum to be granted. 20 of these women were from the Middle East, and 20 were from Latin America.

Nearly all the women had made themselves «visible» through their political activity. They were well-educated and very motivated to talk about the conditions in their homelands. In this way, they could express and explain, in a very vivid and differentiated way, the circumstances of their own lives and also of the lives of their silent sisters in poorer conditions.

Through their testimonies, I tried to understand how sexual abuse of women who belong to a certain "dangerous" group, is connected with the surrounding sexual and political power-structure and with the historically transmitted definitions of "the shameful," and "the unclean" (Douglas, 1966; Heller, 1985). This could, I thought, add to the understanding of the problem of complicity: the paradoxical feeling of complicity which can arise in a person who has submitted to sexual - but also to other forms of - abuse.

It was my hypothesis that understanding the social and psychological dynamics of this problem would give us better premises for therapeutic work with women who have suffered human rights violations. It would also give us better premises for understanding the dynamics of other forms of sexual trauma - e.g.: rape, incest and women battering.

GENDER

The testimonies of the refugee women expressed a nearly universal pattern of female oppression which, of course, had local variations. This universal pattern expresses itself in a wide range of human rights violations of females: as in rape, wife battering, incest and prostitution. The common characteristic of all these forms of gender specific abuse is the violations of the women's right to their own bodies - to physical and psychological integrity - ultimately, to a life in dignity. The gender-specific human rights violations of women all evolve around sexuality; sexuality used as a means to control, exploit and punish women.

In most parts of the world, the significant defining spaces in women's lives are those which are connected with sexuality and reproduction. It is, therefore, also within those defining spaces that the social and political control of women is exercised (Goddard, 1987). Those dangerous women who do not live according to social expectations, those who do not want to be silent and invisible are disciplined. These mechanisms of social control of dangerous women are clear-cut examples of the social control that also governs the lives of their more silent and invisible sisters.

Silent and invisible people are easier to manipulate and dominate. Testimony is one way to insure that the silent victims are given a voice. Testimony documents social memory. However, testimony can also become an important part of a reconciliation process.

There seems to be a major contradiction between the psychological processes involved in reconciliation and those involved in social memory. Reconciliation involves re-creating trust between people who are divided by hatred and fear of each other; social remembrance and testimony require keeping all that happened - both the good and the evil - in the collective memory of these same people - in our memory.

Is it so that we must forget old grievances in order to build peace? Or, is it necessary to remember the evil which happened in order to insure that it not happens again?
Here, I argue for the necessity of combining the processes of reconciliation with the construction of social memory. More specifically, I want to suggest these issues for discussion in the search for new methods and aims in trauma therapy. How can the divergent perspectives of reconciliation and social memory be integrated into therapy for victims of war?

RECONCILIATION

- Reconciliation involves identification and support to those groups in the local communities who are striving for peace.
- Reconciliation is the creation of peace from below, involving work on the grass-roots, community level with the specific aim of re-creating trust between members of the warring factions.
- Reconciliation works at establishing a dialogue between the divided groups - overemphasizing the spiritual division between the groups and creating new hope for a peaceful future.
- Reconciliation works at changing local power-structures so that those factions that advocate war and violent solutions become marginal.
- Reconciliation works at changing the demonic/satanic image of the enemy towards a more realistic conception: not everyone belonging to the enemy-group are bad, although some are.
- Reconciliation, therefore, also involves getting to know the feelings and the thoughts of ordinary people belonging to the other side. Ordinary people on all sides are victims of the war, victims of human rights violations.
- Reconciliation, however, also implies a search for justice and truth. Reconciliation is, thus, a process which follows two paths: changing the demonic image of the others, getting acquainted with their suffering, their feelings and thoughts, as well as remembering the truth about what some of those others have done.

SOCIAL MEMORY

History exists as an un-avoidable fact. The individual woman, man, child, family have lived through this history. Before the violence began there was also a history of having lived together with «the others», having married them, having had children with them, having been good neighbors with them. Social memory also contains this good and positive aspect.

There is also the evil part of social memory. The local community has suffered this experience, have become up-rooted, destroyed, traumatized, divided and betrayed in every imaginable way. It has happened and there are thousands of stories that need to be told about those bad times. The violence is part of the social memory of the war, they are events that cannot be denied or forgotten. They will continue to live in the social memory of the community and the individual people who suffered them. They will also continue to live in the memory of those who witnessed them - and those who perpetrated them.

So social memory contains these two aspects: the stories of both the good and the evil experiences. As often happens when people are under severe stress: the image of the other is split into a good and a bad part:
either they are completely bad or completely good. Under war-conditions, the enemy group will usually be perceived as completely bad, while members of our own group are completely good. It becomes threatening to remember the positive part of history, the times when it was possible to live together with members of the other groups. If peace is restored only by directives from the leadership level, we might see a reversal of this picture: Now the bad part of history must be «forgotten» - it must be denied, repressed or silenced.

What happens if this social memory is repressed, or cut-off and dissociated? What happens if this unresolved past is preserved in the icebox of history? What happens if it is not integrated into the collective consciousness of the people? What happens if the survivors of violence and abuse are silenced? What happens if the rapes become a shameful secret that lives on in the victims as their individual problem, their dark past?

As therapists we know very well what can happen if individuals carry a heavy burden of past traumatic experiences which have not been integrated and worked-through. From dictatorships we have also learned that destruction of social memory is an important means of domination.

In the social memory of a group, an experience which has been hidden for a long time, has been cut-off, repressed, dissociated - but never fully forgotten, supplies constant fuel for further conflicts, if ignited by a new traumatizing experience.

The shame and anger coming from the narcissistic wound will supply more fuel. The low self-esteem will enforce a strong need for identity. Easily, a culture is created which takes on the same shape as the aggressor's (Stiglmayer, 1994).

Again and again during my stay in the countries of the former Yugoslavia, I have been confronted with the social memory of the Second World War. Old, evil memories from this war have surfaced and are being re-lived. Some of the older people also have painful memories from the First World War. In the collective unconsciousness, wars from even earlier times are surfacing and supply fuel for new and continued violence.

We have seen how this war has revealed hidden memories of the Second World War in other countries. In Germany, thousands of women who were raped by the invading troops after the fall of the Nazi-regime are beginning to speak-out, after having kept the abuse as a shameful secret for nearly fifty years. For many of us working here as humanitarian aid-workers, this war has confronted us with what happened in our own countries during the Second World War, and it has shaken our sense of security and trust.

The efforts at reconciliation and constructing social memory here will touch all of us, all the people who have witnessed the disaster here. In the individual and collective healing of the trauma of war, how do we create ritual spaces where testimony can be given, and where the truth can become an established part of social memory?

CWF is an international humanitarian organization, formed by clowns and by performers of other artistic fields which seeks to protect and improve the position of refugees, especially children in camps around the world.

CWF wants to improve the psychological, educational and, where possible, the health situation in the camps. CWF endorses its presence in the camps by collaborating closely with other humanitarian organizations working with the refugees. Performances or workshops can be set up on request. CWF is conscious of the positive influence that clowns are able to bring to the world.
Apart from the immediate value of bringing some joy and fun to refugee children, CWF also wants to bring the plight of such children to the public eye with informative bulletins, films of performances in the camps, and regular articles in magazines and newspapers.

Staff Members: Local 32, International 1

Main goals of project:
To open counselling centers; to train new community mental health workers; to increase access to mass media that include increased mental health related programming. Combating the increasing social isolation and conflict among groups within Sarajevo is a primary objective of this project. The widespread despair and abandonment people feel can have serious psychological and physical consequences. Counselling centers target women and their children, but services are available to all citizens who can reach the centers. In addition, outreach programs are organized to provide services for people who do not leave their homes due to fear of the fighting, and people who are disabled or who have other special needs. Cultural and diversion activities are organized in order to improve people's spirits, to encourage interaction, to give people something to look forward to.

Beneficiaries: Refugee war-traumatized (physically and psychologically) asthmatic children and youth, App. 300

Staff Members: Local 6, International 0

Main goals of project: Due to bad climate, cold and harsh winters and numerous industrial centers in Bosnia, many Bosnian children are diagnosed as having asthma. Since Bosnian children have limited rights regarding health care, it is almost impossible to treat chronic asthmatic cases adequately. Life in refugee camps also has a great impact on the children's medical and psycho-social status. The objective is to treat asthmatic refugee children through an interdisciplinary approach including care for their mental health and development.

Activities:

Education:
Psycho-education/awareness raising; information meetings for parents and teachers as well as local professionals: mass media activities

Needs: a more constant dissemination of information in mass-media on psycho-education

Psychologically oriented group-work:
Art therapeutic activities and other group activities implemented in classes as part of normal curriculum.

Needs: extension of these activities to larger parts of the target population

Psychological services:
Trained pedagogues and psychologists are supervising teachers carrying out therapeutic group interventions; samples of target population are systematically screened for war trauma and grief reactions; local care-givers are offering specific support to severely affected children and their families, according to capacity.

Needs: more training and support by professionals, and for professionals themselves.

Training programme:
For teachers: recognition of and interventions with traumatized children with focus on art-therapy and group-debriefings; for school-psychologists / psychologists: work with children with PTSD (psychological debriefing, therapeutic interviews).

Needs: training for larger numbers of teachers and child professionals, for professional supervision and burn-out prevention.

Beneficiaries: Displaced, refugee and local children App. 20500 parents and teachers

Staff Members: Local 1, International 1
Main goals of project: The program is focusing on PTSD and other stress-related disturbances caused by direct exposure to war. Through training seminars special activities are implemented in primary schools and preschool institutions, to a lesser degree in special institutions including hospitals. So far, focus has been on establishing networks of local professionals, and basic training of these. With focus on group-activities the professionals are encouraged to implement special therapeutic activities in their institutions/communities. Through systematic screening of samples among the target populations with self-administered questionnaires, individuals at risk are identified, and also documentation produced which is important for raising the awareness in the local community.

- Training programme: For young people: self-esteem and leadership skills training

Needs: financial support to include as many young people as possible

Psychologically oriented group-work:
Self-help groups for youth from B&H, Croatia, Kosovo, Serbia and Vojvodina

Beneficiaries: Displaced, refugee and local youth App. 90

Staff Members: Local 7, International 10

Main goals of project: "It's Our Turn" is a youth initiated project. It gathers youth from Croatia, B&H, Kosovo, Serbia and Vojvodina, areas which are in war (directly or indirectly). Having lived in isolation from each other for 3 years already, it is easy to build strong prejudices and get into the circle of hate and aggression. This project represents an effort to stop that process and build new bridges between us. We don't want tomorrow to look like today.
Title: War Theatre

Source of funding: USAID, IRC

Project period: December 1993 - unknown

         Edita Bacic, HO Split, Phone:+385 58/588-937, Fax:+385 58/42-100

Activities:

Community Development/Social Services:
Dancing competitions, organizing "singing or telling stories competitions" for children; if the mothers want they can be "house wives" for a day; swimming school; organizing quizzes that can be a kind of non-official education

Psychologically oriented group-work:
Self-help groups for women

Psychological services:
Individual and group counselling

Beneficiaries: Displaced and refugee children, youth and women App. 100

Staff Members: Local 8, International 0

Main goals of project:
To organize summer holidays for women and children. It's almost impossible to imagine what it means to children and their mothers to take them from the camp to "everyday life" where they can prepare food according to their own wishes and have "free time" with a lot of activities. We realized by visiting them in the camps that they really needed something to be changed or they would become hopelessly depressive.

Activities: Community Development/Social Services:
Knitting gloves and socks, making table-cloths; going to cinemas, excursions; exhibitions of hand-made products in Austria

Needs: more financial support

Education:
Developing the interest of women and children for reading; supplying children with note-books, pencils

Psychologically oriented group-work:
Self-help groups

Psychological services:
Individual and group counselling

Beneficiaries: Displaced and refugee war-traumatized women App. 300

Staff Members: Local 8, International 0

Main goals of project: To visit the women in refugee camps, speak with them and try to help them survive this horrible war. We try to give them confidence so that they have strength to overcome this situation and trust that there is a future for them. Special efforts must be done with nationalism which is, unfortunately, very strong among many refugee women. Very often the nationalism is used to cover other problems, but we are aware that it is very dangerous, and we spend a lot of our time with the refugees to make them live in peace together.

Staff Members: Local 60, International 1

Main goals of project: To provide gynecological and general medical treatment for women and girls who have been war-raped, detained, held in home custody or displaced. Treatment is provided in a gynecological outpatient ward for refugee women and inhabitants of Zenica. The all female professional team consists of one gynecologist, one general practitioner, two anesthesiologists and six nurses. Also provision of psychological/psychiatric treatment in an inpatient ward for psychological and physical rehabilitation. This team consists of three psychologists, one psychiatrist and a female priest, all working in shifts. Shelter is provided for the refugee women. When the war ends the center can be transformed into a shelter for raped women and girls, if necessary. Women run their own households with support of the Medica-team and they also receive education. Another purpose of the project is to do sociological and analytical research.

ECHO's involvement in caring for the psychological and social needs of victims of war has been a constant since the images of mass detention and rape first came to light. ECTF's Psycho-Social Unit was created to support ECHO's assistance to traumatized women and children.

Among the tasks of ECTF's Psycho-Social Unit is the development of methods to ensure the best possible therapeutic assistance to victims of war trauma. This book addresses the question:

Under war conditions what defines a psycho-social project?

The book approaches this question from both a theoretical and practical point of view.

offers theoretical reflections on:

- Strategies of psycho-social projects for victims of war
- Understanding the trauma of humanitarian aid workers
- Trauma and testimony among refugee women

PART TWO

presents an overview of:

- The approaches of 117 organizations assisting victims of war through 185 psycho-social projects in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia during 1994
- This section documents the pioneering efforts of diverse humanitarian agencies to bring relief in the midst of a tragic war
