Unfair terms in contracts concluded with consumers

I – The problem

1. In all the Community Member States, in both civil law and common law systems, the fundamental principle of contract law is that the parties to a contract are free to negotiate its terms. In those countries with a codified civil law system (France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Italy, the Federal Republic of Germany, Denmark, the Netherlands and Greece), the civil codes devised and drafted in the nineteenth century allow the contracting parties considerable freedom of negotiation. Generally, the rules they lay down form a framework leaving the contracting parties considerable scope to derogate from or supplement their provisions.

2. The position is very similar in the common law countries (United Kingdom and Ireland). The contracting parties are normally free to negotiate the terms of a contract, and each party, particularly the purchaser of goods, is responsible for ensuring that the contract concluded is not to his disadvantage (caveat emptor). Statute law has been used only to prevent flagrant abuses.

3. The emergence of a society of mass production, distribution and consumption has resulted in the increasing formalization of contracts, and particularly in the development of standard form contracts. The use of standard terms is now widespread throughout the Community, and applies in the vast majority of contracts between suppliers and consumers. For example, contracts for the sale of consumer durables or for the supply of electricity, gas or water are, as a rule, subject to standard terms, drawn up in advance by the supplier. Many other examples could be cited.

4. In real economic terms, there are essentially only two types of transaction in which contract terms are not generally formulated in advance:
   - atypical transactions relating to situations so far removed from the norm that standard terms are inappropriate;
   - on-the-spot transactions which do not involve a substantial risk for the supplier, such as retail sales of foodstuffs, books or cosmetics.

5. Standard contract terms play an important part, not only in consumer contracts, but also in those between traders. This working paper is concerned only with consumer contracts, but it should be borne in mind that many of the arguments put forward apply equally well to other contracts, particularly those between small traders and their suppliers.

6. Although many of the details of the typical consumer contract – such as price, time of delivery and description of the goods – vary from contract to contract, the underlying legal framework – the supplier’s standard business conditions – does not. The application of these conditions to his own contract may seriously prejudice the consumer’s interests.

7. Standard conditions may provide, for example, that stipulations as to time of delivery are purely indicative in character and have no binding force, so that the consumer is left without a remedy if the goods are not delivered within the time specified. Furthermore, the very fact that the consumer is permitted to stipulate a time may actually work to his detriment in such cases: for it may give him the impression that his stipulation is a term of the contract. If he had been told unequivocally that delivery times were not guaranteed and that there was, therefore, no point in his choosing a date, he might well have decided either not to make the contract with that supplier, or to try to negotiate on the basis that the standard condition in question should not apply and that the stipulation as to delivery time was a term of the contract.

8. Standard conditions may go so far as to purport to exclude the consumer’s rights under the general law, sometimes offering him a more limited ‘warranty’ in exchange. This situation, which may reasonably be described as an abuse of the principle of freedom of contract, has led to the adoption in a number of Member States of legislation designed to redress the balance in favour of the consumer: details are given below in section II of this paper.

9. A possible ‘self help’ remedy has already been suggested at paragraph 7 above: the consumer may try to make the contract on terms other than those proposed by the supplier. However, very few consumers will be sufficiently well informed to do so; and those who try, for example, by striking out clauses to which they object, and stipulating that the general provisions of the law shall apply, may well find that the supplier refuses to do business except on his own standard conditions. Moreover, the consumer who then decided to try another supplier will almost inevitably find himself faced with that supplier’s standard conditions.

10. There appear to be two main types of standard term contract which may cause problems for consumers. First, standard form contracts, which for the purposes of this discussion paper mean contracts prepared and printed in advance: only the name and address of the purchaser and details identifying the goods or services in question need be added in each individual case. The use of standard form contracts effectively excludes the possibility of real negotiation between the parties on the conditions governing the subject matter of the contract (although there may be negotiation on such matters as the price and the specifications of the goods). Secondly, contracts other than the above, whether or not in writing, made subject to the supplier’s standard business conditions: typical examples are contracts for services such as dry-cleaning or transport, where a ticket or voucher is generally given, and written contracts for structural work on buildings. In these cases some of the terms may well be negotiated between the parties, but the standard conditions used by the supplier often purport to restrict or exclude the effect of such negotiation, as outlined under 7 above. In the case of oral contracts there is, from the consumer’s point of view, the additional difficulty of proof.

11. Standard contract terms have the advantage of saving time on negotiation and, from the consumer’s point of view, ought strictly to provide greater legal certainty than non-standard terms, as they have been used in a large number of contracts and may even have the subject of court decisions. In practice, however, the typical consumer, not being a lawyer, is very unlikely to be aware of this.

12. In most cases, standard terms are drawn up by or on behalf of the supplier for use in his dealings with consumers. In some cases they are prepared by the company’s legal department, or adapted from a model prepared by an independent legal adviser; in others, they are drawn up by a trade association for use by its members. The common feature of all these methods is that the standard terms are drawn up without the consumer’s participation, so he is unable to assert his interests and ensure that they are reflected in the terms.

13. Many, if not most, consumers who enter into contracts made on standard terms do so in ignorance of their precise meaning. Frequently, although the contract stipulates that signature by the consumer indicates that he understands and accepts all its terms, the consumer has in practice no real opportunity to study the terms, for example, because they have not been communicated to him in advance, or because he has simply been advised that they are available on request or are to be found elsewhere. Moreover, even if the consumer has the opportunity to study the terms, he will probably be unaware of the precise legal significance of the language used, and may therefore be misled as to the contract’s true meaning.

14. While the law generally ensures a certain equilibrium between the various interests involved, it is not the purpose or effect of standard terms to establish a fair balance. They are designed to reinforce the economic and legal position of the party who drew them up and uses them. The main purpose of the various clauses governing, for example, the terms of payment of the contract price or the obligations of the supplier in the event of non-delivery or faulty delivery is to limit the supplier’s contractual obligations and liabilities while adding to those of the consumer. Since the terms were designed, drawn up and applied unilaterally by the supplier, they improve his bargaining power. The result is that the consumer’s position in negotiating and performing contracts with a supplier is further weakened. The reason for this is that the consumer is rarely in an economic position in relation to the supplier which enables him to impose contract terms on the supplier.

15. The widespread use of standard contract terms can thus be seen as calling into question the consensual basis of contract law. It was long believed that the provisions of the general law ensured an equitable balance between the parties to a contract, while parliament and the courts saw to it that this balance was maintained. Since the parties to a contract may in so many cases derogate from the law’s provisions, however, the equitable balance which such laws might have guaranteed is almost never achieved, because suppliers use standard terms designed primarily to protect their own interests.
II – The situation in the Member States

General observations

16. The principles of the law of contract were to a great extent laid down in the last century, and were devised for parties of approximately equal economic power. This was not an altogether realistic view of the typical contract even then: and it is clearly inappropriate today. Rather, however, than take an approach which would involve a general reform of the law of contract, at least in so far as it concerns consumer contracts, a number of Member States in recent years enacted specific legislation dealing with particular types of contract between suppliers and consumers (for example, ‘doorstep’ contracts, consumer credit and travel contracts). These laws frequently prohibit any derogation from their provisions.

17. Nevertheless, both approaches – general reform or partial reform by sector of the law and contract – require a considerable investment of time and effort. In a society of mass production and distribution any general reform may well have a major impact on the existing economic and legal structures and cause considerable confusion. While affording consumers a degree of protection, mandatory legislation is at the same time open to criticism as restricting business activity. This frequently leads to more general criticism of excessive legislation on the grounds that it restricts economic freedom and leads to the risk of higher unemployment following price rises, or to loss of competitiveness. Moreover, as it is difficult to evaluate precisely the full impact of new legislation on a given sector of the economy or production and distribution in general, it is not surprising that legislative action sometimes takes a very long time. For example, negotiations on the international convention on a Uniform Law on International Sale of Goods (ULIS) took over 20 years. The process is, admittedly, much faster at national level, but it is still apparent that the drafting and amendment of national legislation does not always keep pace with the need to maintain a balance between the interests of consumers and suppliers. This gap between economic reality and the legislative process is often increased by the fact that laws, being abstract and general in nature, cannot always take account of all aspects of economic activity. Their precise impact often appears in the interpretation they receive in court decisions, even when drafted in very narrow or precise terms.

18. To sum up:

– overall or specific legislative action, whether national or international, takes considerable time to prepare and implement;

– the fact that it is abstract and does not specifically deal with all aspects of economic activity means that it cannot cover every situation in which there is an imbalance between the rights and obligations of the contracting parties;

– the economic situation evolves so rapidly that it cannot be accurately and permanently reflected in legislation.

19. In seeking a solution to the problems raised by contract terms drawn up unilaterally, Member States have generally introduced a number of measures adopting where appropriate mandatory provisions governing certain types of contract or economic activity. The measures given as examples below are in many cases concurrent with and supplemented by other provisions.

20. To mitigate some of the consequences of standard contract terms, a general provision may be incorporated in the law laying down the principle that contract terms must not be unfair. Provisions of this kind are to be found in the following laws:

– the Danish Marketing Practices Act of 1974, which requires general compliance with fair commercial practice;

– the Luxembourg Law of 25 August 1983 on the legal protection of the consumer;

– the German Law of 9 December 1976 on general conditions of business (Gesetz zur Regelung des Rechts der Allgemeinen Geschäftsbedingungen), which lays down that a contract term drawn up by one party and placing the other at a disadvantage is void if it is in bad faith;

– the French Law of 1978 on consumer protection and information, providing for the banning, limiting or regulating of contract terms which appear to have been imposed on the consumer as a result of the other party’s abuse of his economic power, giving that party an excessive advantage: such terms are void.

21. A number of legal systems have a black list of clauses which are regarded as prejudicial to the interests of consumers: the penalties for using such clauses vary:

- the British Unfair Contract Terms Act, 1977, renders void clauses restricting liability for economic loss, unless the supplier can satisfy a court that they are reasonable in the circumstances; the Consumer Transactions (Restrictions on Statements) Order, 1976 (made under the Fair Trading Act, 1973) makes it a criminal offence to display certain statements, such as 'no refund' notices, which purport to limit a consumer's rights under the general law of contract;

- the Irish Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act, 1980, contains very similar provisions;

- the German Law of 1976 on general conditions lays down a list of prohibited terms and distinguishes between those cases in which some latitude is allowed in assessing whether or not a term is unfair and other case where it is not;

- the Luxembourg Law of 25 August 1983 lists 20 clauses which are deemed unfair.

22. Regardless of whether or not legal provisions are adopted governing the content of contract terms, a better balance between the interests of suppliers and consumers can be achieved by negotiations on the drafting of standard terms.

- the Danish Marketing Practices Act of 1974 entrusts the Consumer Ombudsman with the task of promoting compliance with fair commercial practice. To this end, he negotiates standard contract terms with suppliers or their trade associations.

- in the Netherlands in particular, but also in Belgium, France and Germany (automobile sector), consumer associations have negotiated standard contract terms with the representatives of given industrial or commercial sectors in an attempt to reach a compromise between the different interests involved. It appears that, with the exception of the automobile sector in Germany, these initiatives have been only moderately successful, partly because there are no legal constraints in the event of a breakdown in negotiations, partly because suppliers are in many cases unwilling to participate.

23. Some national laws have introduced specific checks on unfair contract terms:

- the German Law of 1976 entitles consumer associations and certain other bodies to bring actions to put an end to the use of standard contract terms which conflict with the provisions of the law (a similar rule appears in the Dutch draft law);

- the French Law of 1978 set up a commission on unfair terms to examine contract terms and determine whether they were likely 'to create an obvious imbalance between the rights and obligations of the parties, to the consumer's detriment'. The commission makes recommendations, where appropriate, and sends them to the government. It is for the government to decide whether the recommendations should be published.

24. Another approach would be to require prior authorization to be obtained in cases involving standard contract terms. A number of States have adopted this approach for the insurance sector. However, the large number of different standard contracts – in Germany alone, there are some 1 400 standard life assurance contracts and 1 500 standard accident insurance contracts – would seem at first sight to rule out any wider use of this approach.

25. There have been proposals to allow the public authorities to draw up standard terms or a standard contract for a given economic sector. (See, for example, the Netherlands draft civil code and the Luxembourg Law of 25 August 1983. A similar proposal has been made in France in respect of travel contracts.) However, because of the lengthy procedure involved, requiring thorough consultation with the relevant interest groups, this approach would not seem at first sight to be likely to produce results more quickly than the legislative or rule-making approach.

The current legislative position

Belgium

26. There is no general law on unfair contract terms. Specific legislation governs only a few types of contract (transport, travel and insurance contracts).
A draft law amending the Law on commercial practices of 14 July 1971 was tabled in 1977. The draft contains a general provision on contracts concluded with consumers laying down that any onerous clause causing an excessive imbalance between the rights and obligations of the parties, to the consumer's detriment, is void. A sample list of nine types of clause regarded as onerous within the meaning of the law is added. The use of certain clauses may be made obligatory, or prohibited, by Royal decree. Actions to put an end to infringements may be brought in the event of non-compliance with such decrees.

France

27. The Law of 10 January 1978 provides for the prohibition or regulation, by decree, of certain clauses which 'appear to have been imposed on the consumer as a result of the other party's abuse of his economic position, giving that party an excessive advantage'. A commission on unfair terms, consisting of representatives of consumer and trade interests, judges, lawyers and civil servants, was given the task of examining models of agreements normally used by suppliers and may recommend the deletion or amendment of clauses found to be unfair. The minister responsible may make these recommendations public. The commission has to date published three annual reports on its activity, for the years 1978, 1979 and 1980. In these reports, the commission gives a broad outline of its recommendations, ten of which have been made public – for example, No 80-03 of 8 August 1980, recommending that terms allowing the supplier, but not the consumer, a 'cooling-off' period after the contract has been made should be eliminated from contracts as being unfair. The reports also mention the commission's opinions on draft standard form contracts.

The commission would like its work, particularly its recommendations, to receive broader publicity. It emphasizes that nearly all its studies have been adopted unanimously by its members. It regrets that this consensus has not yet been given practical implementation. Although some contract terms have been found to be void, in accordance with legal provisions, they continue to be used and consumers may be led to believe they are bound by them. The commission therefore proposes that criminal penalties should be laid down for those who continue to use these terms in contracts.

The commission also proposes a number of legislative reforms, aimed at improving contract practices.

Since the entry into force of the Law of 10 January 1978, only one decree has been issued to prohibit or regulate the use of unfair terms (Decree of 24 March 1978). This decree prohibits three types of contract term, including terms giving the supplier the right to alter the price originally agreed, and provided that, in certain circumstances, the purchaser must be informed of his strict legal rights. The commission would like to see further decrees issued and practical proposals made.

Luxembourg

28. The Law of 25 August 1983 on the legal protection of the consumer lays down that 'in contracts concluded between a professional supplier of durable or non-durable consumer goods or services and a private end consumer, any clause or combination of clauses which leads to an imbalance in the rights and obligations laid down in the contract to the detriment of the consumer is unfair and as such shall be deemed null and void'. The text also gives a limitative list of 20 unfair clauses.

'The chairman of the court of first instance of the applicant's place of residence may, at the request of any individual, professional group or consumers' association represented on the Prices Commission, declare that a clause or combination of clauses is unfair within the meaning of Articles 1 and 2 and that such clause or combination of clauses shall be deemed null and void. The action shall be brought and judged in accordance with the procedure for matters of special urgency'.

The text provides for the posting and publication of the decision and a penal fine, and allows the individuals, professional groups and consumers' associations referred to above to claim damages before the criminal courts in relation to acts which are detrimental to their individual or collective interests.

Italy

29. The Italian Civil Code of 1942 contains three Articles (1341, 1342 and 1370) on the interpretation of standard contracts and restricting their use. There are no specific checks on unfair terms outside the normal system of judicial control.

The Netherlands

30. A draft law on terms in standard contracts, which will form part of the new civil code, was laid before Parliament in the summer of 1981. It includes a general provision to the effect that contract terms shall not be unfavourable to the consumer and two lists: a black list of terms which are always void and a grey list of terms which may be void, depending on their context. The draft law also allows consumer organizations to go to court to request the banning of particular terms.

Denmark

31. An Act of 1975 amending the Contracts Act of 1917 introduced a general provision whereby a contract may be set aside in whole or in part where it would be unreasonable (urimelig) or contrary to fair commercial practice to allow it to remain.

The Marketing Practices Act of 14 June 1974 established the office of Consumer Ombudsman, whose duty is to ensure compliance with fair commercial practice and includes the supervision of all contract terms, not merely those in consumer contracts.

In recent years a number of laws have been enacted for the protection of consumers in the field of financial transactions: the Interest on Overdue Payments Act (No 638 of 21 December 1977); the Consumer Contracts Act (No 139 of 29 March 1978); and the Act (No 147 of 4 April 1979) amending the Sale of Goods Act, 1906.

The Consumer Ombudsman is empowered by the Marketing Practices Act to negotiate with suppliers or trade associations to end the use of unfair contract terms and other objectionable commercial practices. This procedure has worked well in practice.

The Consumer Ombudsman’s decisions under the Act cannot be challenged before any other administrative body; this gives him effective autonomy in deciding which practices are to be regarded as being in conflict with the Act’s provisions.

The Ombudsman cannot ban practices: if suppliers do not accept his recommendations, he may bring an action before the Maritime and Commercial Court in Copenhagen, which may declare the practices to be void.

Federal Republic of Germany

32. The Law on general conditions of business of 9 December 1976 introduced a general provision governing terms drawn up in advance by any party, banning those which are contrary to good faith (Treu und Glauben) and which place the other party (not necessarily a consumer) at a disadvantage. The law includes two lists of terms deemed to be contrary to these principles: one of terms which are void under all circumstances, such as terms purporting to shift the burden of proof from the supplier onto the consumer; the other of terms whose validity depends on their context (Bewertungsspielraum), such as those allowing the supplier an unusually long time to perform the contract. Trade associations and consumers may bring actions before the ordinary courts to prevent the use of such terms.

United Kingdom

33. The Sale of Goods Act, 1979, provides that contracts with consumers for the supply of goods shall contain terms requiring, for example, that goods shall correspond with their description and be fit for their purpose. The contracting parties may not derogate from these provisions.

The Unfair Contract Terms Act, 1977, aims to render ineffective contract terms which limit liability for negligence in the event of death or personal injury. Where economic loss is involved, any clause which purports to limit the liability of one party is void if it does not satisfy the test of reasonableness set out in the Act. The ordinary courts are responsible for applying these provisions. To date, however, the superior courts have not had the opportunity to rule on their scope.

The Fair Trading Act, 1973, gives the Director General of Fair Trading certain powers to examine commercial practices in use and to make appropriate recommendations to the Govern-
The aim of this document is to promote discussion on the issues raised by unfair terms in contracts concluded with consumers.
